THE COLLEGE FREE SPEECH RANKINGS are the most comprehensive comparison of free speech climates at U.S. colleges and universities. Developed by the Foundation for Individual Rights and Expression, the rankings combine student survey data, written speech policies, and school responses to recent speech-related controversies to evaluate how well institutions uphold free expression. Schools earn higher scores when they protect open debate and viewpoint diversity and lose points when they restrict it.

To understand the student experience of free speech on campus, our survey partner, College Pulse, surveyed 68,510 student respondents from 257 colleges and universities from Jan. 3 through June 5, 2025. The College Free Speech Rankings are available online (rankings.thefire.org) for easy comparison between institutions.

We surveyed 376 Brown University undergraduates. Key findings:

- Brown ranks 187 with a score of 55.2, earning an F speech climate grade.
- Students are uneasy expressing dissent, especially with professors: 69% were uncomfortable publicly disagreeing with a professor in class; 56% felt the same in writing. Only 49% felt comfortable discussing a controversial topic with peers in a common space and 22% on a named social account.
- Self-censorship is routine. At least monthly, 61% self-censored in class, 56% with professors, and 62% with peers. About 27% hid political views from professors at least monthly in hopes of a better grade.
- Acceptance of disruptive tactics is high. 78% said shouting down a speaker is at least rarely acceptable (nationally 71%), 64% said blocking attendees is at least rarely acceptable (nationally 54%), and 32% said violence could be acceptable (nationally 34%).
- Perceived administrative backing is weak. Only 23% said it is very or extremely clear that Brown protects free speech (nationally 36%), and 16% said the administration would defend a speaker (nationally 24%).
- Brown is a “yellow light” school; if policies were reformed to “green light,” Brown would rank 43.
- Brown was penalized for three speech controversies: two involving attempted disruptions of speeches given by President Christina Paxson, and another involving a student investigated for asking administrators over email what tasks they accomplished that week.

Brown University ranks 187 out of 257 schools in the 2026 College Free Speech Rankings. The university earns a score of 55.2, an F speech climate grade.<sup>1</sup> It was penalized for “yellow light” speech policies and three speech controversies. The following report highlights Brown’s poor performance across the student survey. In addition, it discusses Brown’s speech policies and statements, controversies, and what Brown can do to improve its free speech climate.

BROWN SCORES POORLY ON MOST SURVEY COMPONENTS

Students are uncomfortable sharing ideas

Brown University ranks 238 on the “Comfort Expressing Ideas” component. The pattern was consistent across contexts:

- 69% of students were uncomfortable publicly disagreeing with a professor about a political topic in class.
- 55% felt uncomfortable registering that disagreement in writing. General in-class discussion is difficult for many (62% uncomfortable).

By contrast, peer-to-peer conversation in informal settings is easier — about 49% felt comfortable talking about controversial topics in common campus spaces. Comfort dropped sharply on social media (22% comfortable), indicating that students perceive reputational risks when expression is publicly tied to their name.

In practice, this fear means sensitive disagreements — especially with faculty — often go unvoiced. Seminars and discussion-heavy courses may be especially vulnerable to conformity pressures, with fewer students willing to test ideas or articulate minority viewpoints. Over time, the absence of candid pushback can skew classroom debate and limit the diversity of arguments students encounter.

Students self-censor frequently

Brown ranks 142 on “Self-Censorship.” At least monthly, 61% of students self-censored in class, 57% did so when speaking with professors, and 63% did so with peers. In a related measure, about 27% reported hiding their political beliefs from professors at least monthly in an attempt to get a better grade. Students’ open-ended comments described weighing social costs, grade implications, and the possibility of administrative involvement. These habits, once established, can normalize silence and discourage precisely the kind of exploratory thinking universities hope to cultivate.

Students remain relatively accepting of disruptive conduct

Brown ranks 190 on “Disruptive Conduct,” roughly in line with national norms. Still, attitudes toward disruptive tactics are permissive.

- 78% said shouting down a speaker is at least “rarely” acceptable (nationally 72%).
- 64% said blocking other students from attending is at least “rarely” acceptable (nationally 54%).
- 32% said violence could be acceptable at least “rarely” (nationally 34%).

Because the rankings penalize deplatformings and disruptions, shifting norms away from these tactics would both improve campus climate and reduce behavior penalties.

Students are more tolerant of liberal than conservative speakers

Brown ranks 47 on overall “Political Tolerance,” with a clear imbalance by ideology, ranking 33 for liberal speakers versus 149 for conservative speakers. Survey items illustrate the split. Majorities said Brown should not allow speakers who said “Transgender people have a mental disorder” (80% not allow vs. 20% allow) or “Black Lives Matter is a hate group” (78% not allow vs. 22% allow). And a narrow majority opposed a speaker who claimed “Abortion should be completely illegal” (55% not allow vs. 45% allow).

By contrast, majorities supported speakers who said “Children should be able to transition without parental consent” (68% allow vs. 32% not allow) and “The Catholic church is a pedophilic institution” (51% allow vs. 49% not allow). Responses were more evenly divided for the statement “The police are just as racist as the Ku Klux Klan” (48% allow vs. 52% not allow).

Students have difficulty talking about current events

Students report difficulty having open, honest conversations about high-salience issues. The Israeli–Palestinian conflict stands out — 77% said it is difficult to discuss. Other challenging topics include affirmative action (41%), the presidential election (32%), transgender rights (31%), and immigration (28%). Brown ranks 53 on “Openness,” indicating better-than-average but still mediocre student willingness to engage with these subjects and others.

Students don’t trust their administration to protect free speech

Perceived administrative commitment to defending free speech is low. Only 23% said it is very or extremely clear the administration protects free speech (nationally 36%), and only 16% said the administration would defend a speaker during a controversy (nationally 24%). This helps explain Brown’s 207 rank on “Administrative Support.” To change these perceptions, Brown should pair clearer public commitments with consistent actions during flashpoints — defending the right to speak and to listen while enforcing rules against disruption.

A ‘YELLOW LIGHT’ SCHOOL WITH INSTITUTIONAL NEUTRALITY

Brown currently earns a “yellow light” Spotlight rating for policy. Ambiguous or overbroad rules — particularly in areas like harassment or “harm” standards — can chill protected expression by granting broad administrative discretion. At the same time, Brown receives credit for institutional neutrality, which — if maintained — reduces pressure on community members to align with official positions and protects room for dissent. If Brown had reformed its remaining yellow light policies to “green light” standards, its overall placement would have been 43. A public adoption of the “Chicago Statement” would further clarify that the university protects lawful speech, even when offensive.

The university maintains two yellow light policies and two green light policies. One of the university’s harassment policies fails to meet the legal standard for peer hostile environment harassment in an educational setting, putting protected speech that does not reach that threshold at risk. Brown also broadly bans “emotional/psychological harm,” which it defines as “abusive, threatening, bullying, intimidating, harassing, or humiliating actions.” This makes largely unpopular but protected expression punishable by the administration. The administration should instead focus its resources on enforcing its discrimination and harassment policies.

BROWN’S SPEECH CONTROVERSIES

Brown University was penalized for three speech controversies.

Most recently, in April 2025, the university investigated students Alex Shieh, Benjamin Marcus, and Gary Bittker. Using the university’s organizational chart, Shieh created a database of campus administrators and used an algorithm to analyze their perceived efficiency. He then, in his capacity as a member of the conservative campus newspaper The Brown Spectator, sent an email similar to one that had been sent by the Department of Government Efficiency (DOGE) to government employees asking administrators to explain what tasks they had accomplished in the past week. Claiming that Shieh had used “confidential information” in the database’s construction and had “emotionally harmed” employees, administrators demanded he return or destroy the confidential information. Administrators also investigated students Benjamin Marcus, editor-in-chief of The Brown Spectator, and Gary Bittker, the paper’s managing editor, and charged them with a trademark violation due to the paper’s name. Ultimately, none of the three students were formally disciplined.

The university was also penalized for two efforts to disrupt speeches by Brown’s President, Christina Paxson. In a 2024 incident, Paxson’s commencement speech was briefly disrupted by students and members of Brown Alumni for Palestine, who claimed responsibility for leading the disruption. The protesters called on Paxson and Brown, to divest from “companies complicit with the genocide in Palestine.” After a few minutes, Paxson resumed her remarks and successfully completed the commencement address.

Similarly, during a 2023 vigil for a Palestinian student seriously injured in a shooting in Vermont, students shouted over Paxson and called for the university to divest its endowment from companies affiliated with Israel.

HOW CAN BROWN IMPROVE?

The easiest steps Brown University could take are to reform remaining “yellow light” policies to meet narrow, speech-protective standards to earn a “green light”. Adopting the Chicago Statement to codify a principled, viewpoint-neutral commitment to free expression alongside institutional neutrality would boost the ranking further. Also, during controversies, they should defend the right to speak and to listen while enforcing rules against disruption.

Policy changes and better responses to controversies alone do not change a campus’s free speech culture. Brown should communicate these policy changes to students in a way that emphasizes the university’s commitment to free expression and affirms that students and faculty won’t be penalized for protected speech. The university should also take active steps to improve campus culture. For example, Brown could embed expressive rights training into first-year orientation so students learn what is protected expression and when expression crosses into unprotected conduct. These changes could improve Brown’s poor rankings on “Administrative Support” (207) and “Comfort Expressing Ideas” (238).

This next series of questions asks you about self-censorship in different settings. For the purpose of these questions, self-censorship is defined as follows:

Refraining from sharing certain views because you fear social (e.g., exclusion from social events), professional (e.g., losing job or promotion), legal (e.g., prosecution or fine), or violent (e.g., assault) consequences, whether in person or remotely (e.g., by phone or online), and whether the consequences come from state or non-state sources.
